A: This is a good example of the gap between quality and usefulness. My suggestion for "additional context" would be: Crime; as in, the concentration of crime around one area, New York was recovering from a near financial collapse and also coping with a so-called crack epidemic. (NY police were facing a record crime rate.) Those are the facts, but they're not great descriptors - too vague to convey much meaning, IMO. The more I read this, the more I think they're just filler for the line (and a non-descript filler at that). You might find a "context headline" to be more useful, although you would be careful with it because it too needs to be more descriptive: Police Crack Down on Clandestine Drug Distribution Network or Police Crack Down on Family Crime You might find headlines like: New York Yanks Crack Down on Gangs or New York Turns Attention to Family Crime to be useful - we could easily find out what "crack down" means by a quick search and find on Google News that this happened. After that, you have to find a description that will do the job. The "Crack City" headline would be a good place to start. There are two ways to do this: Write a summary sentence that contains all of the elements that you want to appear in your headline. For example, if you want to convey the city's problems with violent crime, you could write Police Crack Down on Gangs and Crime You could also write a complete sentence (again, just one, from your consideration set) that helps convey your conclusion. For example: Police Crack Down on Family Crime Do you see a pattern? The headline describes the problem, and the summary sentence shows how the police are going to fix it. You are the good reporter, so you have to choose which way you want to go. A: Crack is the city's biggest problem. My answer is based on the fact that the verb "crack" has the following definition in "Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary" : 1. a. usually or wholly, as a rule: to crack down on a criminal or other evil
